Market Report

Addressing global health inequities requires a comprehensive response from the world’s surgical, anesthesia, and obstetrics and gynecology (OB/GYN) communities. These health care professionals need to share evidence-based knowledge and experience and collaborate to develop training programs and initiatives that ensure sustained, functioning health care systems. The world has experienced significant improvements in health care for millions because of effective global public health programs. However, these improvements have exposed the significant burden of obstetrical and surgical disease facing most of the world’s population. Tremendous gaps exist in expertise, workforce, and infrastructure, all of which are essential to provide critical surgical, anesthesia, and modern OB/GYN care in low- and middle-income countries (LMICs).

Advances have also resulted from a change in the attitudes and practice of gynaecologists themselves, in response to the greater expectations and knowledge of their patients, who frequently seek new and innovative procedures on the basis of media publicity and access to non-peer reviewed information including the world wide web. It is increasingly recognized that gynaecological problems affect the quality of life of women in different ways, highlighting the value and importance of patient assessed health status measures to evaluate the subjective severity and treatment efficacy of common gynaecological conditions.
